February has had an opt-out testing program for the at-risk

In the next few weeks, Whelan said, the Free Clinic will be finalizing its consent-to-treat form and training staff to work with patients who may have questions about the testing HIV/AIDS as of 2012, according The clinic will offer pre- and post-test counseling services just as before.

Half of the Free Clinic's funding comes from foundations, a quarter from individual donations and the remaining quarter from state and federal money, said its director of volunteer and external relations, Melissa Ghoston.

"We have a policy that we accept everybody who doesn't have health insurance, and even for those who do, if they can't access it or feel it would jeopardize it, we do take them in," said Whelan.

Whelan said they do not expect the costs of the HIV optout program to create a financial burden, as the screening will be a part of an alreadyexisting blood test for patients that the Cleveland Clinic processes for free.

She says the Free Clinic will use the Treatment as Prevention method once patients have been identified as HIVpositive. Treatment as Prevention, which has been gaining traction in the global fight against the spread of HIV, places patients on antiretroviral treatment as soon as they are diagnosed to reduce their viral load and the likelihood of transmitting HIV to their partners or babies.

The Free Clinic will continue to work on stopping the spread of HIV in Greater Cleveland by informing at-risk communities. "One thing I don't want to get lost is the prevention piece of it," said Johnson. "It's one erally funded Care Alliance thing to test someone, it's another thing to educate them."

High note: Driving Euclid's Dille Road is less of a downer these days.

Workers filled a bottom-your-carout pavement depression that many motorists veered left to avoid immediately after crossing a set of railroad tracks at the city's border with Cleveland. A column correspondent worried that all those swerving cars could lead to a crash. The repair followed Road Rant sharing that concern.

Change orders: Driving east or west of Ohio keeps taking more of a

The Pennsylvania Turnpike Commission recently approved higher rates for 2013 on its roadway. Tolls will rise 10 percent for those paying cash and 2 percent for those using E-ZPass, the electronic tolling system. The new price plan begins Jan. 6 — which will make it five consecutive years of rate hikes.

Going west, meanwhile, the cost to drive a car the full length of the Indiana Toll Road increased by nearly 4½ percent last month for cash-paying customers. The 157-mile trip now runs $9.40, up from $9. This marks the fourth price bump since 2008 for those using dollars and coins. (The price for E-ZPass customers remains $4.65 the same rate motorists paid in 1985.)

The Ohio Turnpike raised rates by roughly 10 percent earlier this year. Officials said there are no discussions for a toll increase in 2013.
